CEO of the media firm Revolution was second-best at the “Pulitzeries” last year when his firm, which also acquired the art site Art.sy, was beaten by BuzzFeed for the first-place prize in digital news and entertainment.

Revolution later filed for bankruptcy, resulting in a $152 million payment to BuzzFeed. Last year, when Advance launched its Flipboard-esque digital news aggregator TimesLean, it was positioned in second place. But the app failed to make the cut as the winner of the 2016 Digital News Innovation Awards. “They’re just used to being second, and when they get there, there are doubts,” says Moore, who has 20 years of media experience. “People who have been doing this a long time know that if you’re not first, you’re in trouble. The client base grows very quickly if you have that recognition.” This week, times are good. Advance is in the thick of a retail boom in which it’s the No. 2 advertiser behind Facebook, according to comScore. The company also ranked second in digital ad spending in the first quarter of 2016. It ranked No. 4 in total digital ad spending last year. Moore says he’s optimistic. “It’s funny that after 12 years in this business, I still feel like I’m on the right track,” he says. “We’ve been doing very well.” But Advance is also in a curious spot in which its market dominance — it holds the No. 1 and No. 2 positions in digital news and entertainment, respectively, in the U.S. — puts it in a precarious position. It has to make sure it’s one or the other, Moore says. If it’s both, it might be cannibalizing its own business. “It
